"Ian Schneider"

At the 9/11 Memorial

ABSTRACT A poetic emergence of the particular—a particular place, day, time, moment, event—and its (extra)ordinary affect. KEYWORDS Poetic inquiry; Affect; 9/11

It would have been a day like today:
the sun in a flawless sky searing light shards across silver-shone window-walls

While below—impatient, eager—you waited to cross Broadway's charged traffic

It would have been a day like today:
the Lego®-yellow cranes lifting concrete blocks to feed open-mouthed pillars

While below you passed St. Paul's beneath the churchyard trees showing their first autumn leaves

It would have been a day like today:
the tourists in clusters peering upwards in awe at the daring of human ambition

While below you collected your morning double espresso, and took the elevator to your office

It would have been a day like today:
but today's flawless sky is empty, save for a single indifferent plane and the cranes steer upwards undisturbed

While below we cluster where you fell, staring at endless water falling, and I trace the letters of your bronze-inscribed name
